Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: ..."a stock of cows," and, taking them with him, started upon a southward journey. To the men of the town he said: "I came from England because I did not like the LordBishops; but I cannot join with you, because I would not be under the Lord-Brethren!" II. Mr. Blackstone's way lay through forests and across streams. No road ran broad and smooth before him. No bridges led him dryshod over the water-courses. His path, at best, must have been an Indian trail, winding toward shallow fords, or where great rocks made stepping-stones from shore to shore. Did he have an Indian guide? Did he go afoot? Did he take his books with him then, or send for them later? How were they carried,--by Indians or by one of the few horses brought from England? Among his books Mr. Blackstone had some papers which we think might have answered questions like these; but the papers and books were all burned not long after Mr. Blackstone's death, and we shall never know what they may have had to tell of his life in England and in this country. The journey was brought to an end at about forty miles from Boston, beside a narrow river in a lovely fertile valley. On the eastern bank of the river Mr. Blackstone found a meadow which rose in three stretches, like three long, wide steps, each higher than the last. On the first of these he built a house; on the second he dug a well. A new garden grew here under his care; so did a new apple-orchard. The place came to be known as Rehoboth, and the river was named for him,--the Blackstone. That part of Rehoboth is Lonsdale now, but the river still holds its old name. At Rehoboth Mr. Blackstone again led a hermit's life. Here he was even farther away from other men than he had been at Shawmut. He found the new home much to his liking...
